Prince Albert's Funeral

THE REMAINS OF A GRANDSON OF THE GREAT KAMEHAMEHA ARE LAID TO REST IN THE MAUSOLEUM OF THE LAST DYNASTY OF THE KINGS OF HAWAII WITH MUCH POMP.

The remains of Albert K. Kuniakaea, last Prince of the Kamehameha line, were laid away in the Royal Mausoleum in Nu-anu cemetery yesterday with all the honors due to a prince of such distinguished lineage. For the last time the tabu-sticks of the Kamehamehas were brought forth, and the splendid kahilis of the prince's house were used in their solemn offices. For a day Honolulu seemed to have a restored monarchy, for chiefs and chieftesses held their old-time rank in the presence of royalty dead, and the brilliant cloaks of Hawaiians of high station, the gold trappings of Hawaiian and white officers of the National Guard, with the truly regal decorations of the Throne room in which the services were held, combined to bring back for a time the conditions of days that are past. Whites joined with the Hawaiians in paying tribute to the noble house of which the dead prince was the last direct descendant. The funeral was in some respects one which Hawaii will not see the like of again, for though there are other persons of royal lineage in the Islands, there are none for whom the kahilis and tabu-sticks of the Kamehamehas can be brought forth, nor for whom the chants of that great house can be sung.

All Saturday night the kahili-bearers kept their sad watch about the bier in the Throne room. At daylight Sunday morning the meles of the Kamehamehas were chanted in that peculiarly, painfully sad monotone which makes the Hawaiian wail something never to be forgotten by those who have heard it. Besides the kahilis and the ahualas, or feather cloaks, a crown draped in mourning, a silk crown flag of Hawaii and the soldiers' guard were evidences of the high rank of the deceased.

At eleven o'clock the doors were opened to the public and from that time until one, there was a steady procession of people of all races, entering at one door of the Throne room and passing around the catafalque to leave by another door. Officers and soldiers kept the people moving, else the room would have been overcrowded in ten minutes. The kahili-bearers kept their places, now and then waving their emblems over the bier in unison, to the music of the Hawaiian hymns, while at intervals the sorrowful chants were resumed. Col. Soper, Captain White, Captain Kenake, Captain Hawes, Captain Campbell and Captain Atherton of the Governor's staff, stood guard in full military dress at different times. At the head of the casket sat the widow of the deceased.

At 1 o'clock Pro-vicar Libert, Father Valentin and Father Stephen of the Catholic mission arrived, and there was a short service. Father Libert spoke the burial service and Father Valentin sang several solos and led the Catholic choir. Then the pall-bearers lifted the casket and, surrounded by the kahilis and preceded by the tabu-sticks, it was carried to the funeral car in front of the palace building.

According to the ancient Hawaiian custom of showing respect for the royal dead by having men and not horses to draw the remains to their last resting place, a hundred and twenty Hawaiians dragged the Prince's bier slowly through the streets to the cemetery. Each one wore upon his shoulders a yellow cape, or ahuala, and William Olepau, who led the poolas, as they are called, wore a full length cloak of red and yellow.

As the funeral cortege started, the battery on Punchbowl began the firing of minute guns, and the slow firing continued while the body was on the way to the mausoleum. The first and second battalions, Hawaiian National Guard, stood with present arms, along the driveway of the Capitol building and wheeled into line later in their place in the procession.

At the cemetery, the Prince and Princess Kalaniana'ole assisted in placing the decorations and arranging the pieces in the Mausoleum before the funeral procession arrived. The casket was borne to its temporary resting place between rows of kahilis, flanked by the tabu-sticks, and the government band played "Nearer My God to Thee," as the cannon on Punchbowl boomed for the last time.

On some future day the remains will be removed to the Kamehameha vault, and placed beside those of Prince Albert's mother and twin brothers.

The weather for the funeral was perfect, and it fulfilled the poetic superstition of old-time Hawaii, which says that there is always rain before the body of a Kamehameha is moved, but not during the procession. There were showers as the bier started for the Capitol building Saturday evening, and a heavy downpour preceded the funeral yesterday. Then the skies remained gloomy but dropped no rain.
